WindowsCo-transmission of unenhanced blood pool radiotracers with renal perfusion scintigraphy improves the diagnosis of renal artery stenosis.
Renal artery stenosis (RAS) is associated with acute renal insufficiency and chronic renal impairment. Currently, the diagnosis of RAS is based on the demonstration of reversible function changes on renal scintigraphy using extracellular volume-interfering (99m)Tc-DTPA. Nevertheless, this study attempts to determine whether enhancement of arterial radiotracers may improve the visualization of RAS. Twenty-one patients with suspected renal disease were included. The blood pool (37 MBq) and the hepatobiliary (150 MBq) radiotracers were injected before and after the administration of 30 MBq of (99m)Tc-DTPA. Images were obtained every 15-30 s. The percentage of peak enhancement (PE) was calculated and two experienced observers compared the results. The analysis of the data was performed by both the paired Student's t-test (in case of normal distribution) and the non-parametric Wilcoxon rank test. Results of the perfusion study were considered significantly abnormal when the following conditions were fulfilled: (1) the improvement in the delineation
